

Media Ownership is a rising concern, and digital rights management is an even bigger issue. End-Consumers have always been allowed to make a "working copy" of all types of media, and keep the "original" in a safe place. I just want to make sure that future digital rights management decisions and media ownership decisions do not jeopardize the end-consumers rights to easily make "working copies" of the media they purchase. The consumer should not have to make dramatic and expensive changes to the way they currently do this. New DRM decisions may make this very complicated. Also, new DRM policies may make piracy and illegal distribution an even greater "challenge" for hackers to break - in other words, hackers will have another thing to strive for... breaking DRM.
